ED is a fact of life

Why didn't my doctor tell me I can be helped?

Anyone who knows me will tell you I am a straight up guy. I've held off on commenting on the erectile dysfunction (ED) controversy until I was able to really do my homework. Well the results are in.

Erectile dysfunction is a fact of life.

Whether it occurs due to an accident, a recent surgery (prostate cancer is a biggie), diabetes, or simply due to aging, the accompanying loss of self esteem is something that effects millions of men every day. And in a nutshell, that seems to be the problem - every man's ED problem is different and requires different treatment.

What color is your favorite pill?

Drug companies have jumped all over this like a - well a drug company. I don't have to say the names - we've all seen the ads - but they've spent millions trying to convince you that one pill fixes all - when in actuality they fail over 50% of the time. And that's just a fact.

Why didn't my doctor tell me?

Don't expect much help from your family doctor. How you perform in the bedroom is not really his concern and he will probably just prescribe some "pills".

Someone who specializes in men's sexual health.

After extensive research the only approach that makes sense comes from companies like Memphis Men's Clinic that have been opening across the country. There is one here in Memphis. We have uniquely combined three medically approved ingredients for ED into 70 different formulations - one of which will make "it" start happening immediately - and I mean immediately for over 92% of all men experiencing ED. In fact, if "it" doesn't start happening on the first visit, you don't pay a single penny.
